David Robins's extensive experience representing plaintiffs and defendants in a wide range of litigation matters including claims for personal injury, wrongful conviction, professional negligence, breach of contract and wrongful dismissal explains why he's highly respected in his field. However, it is David's tenacious attitude that ensures no stone is unturned which underpins his success in civil and class action litigation.

David routinely represents injured plaintiffs in claims for personal injury and payment of insurance benefits, as well as corporate or institutional clients in commercial litigation disputes. His class action practice includes claims for product liability, breach of privacy and breach of contract. David has particular expertise representing plaintiffs in wrongful conviction compensation claims, and he has recovered more than $10 million for wrongly convicted clients.

David was called to the Ontario bar in 1999. He has appeared in all levels of court in Ontario, including the Superior Court of Justice, the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal and has also appeared in the Federal Court of Canada and in other courts across Canada. For several years, David was an adjunct professor at the University of Windsor, Faculty of Law where he taught a course on class actions.
